Description of Business

Bevo Agro Inc. is a public corporation, incorporated on July 9, 1985, under the Company Act (British Columbia), which has been replaced by the Business Corporations Act (British Columbia). Bevo Agro Inc. acquired 100% of the issued and outstanding shares of Bevo Farms Ltd., a B.C. company, on July 11, 2000 by way of a reverse take-over. Bevo Farms Ltd. operates 45 acres of propagation greenhouse facilities on 98 acres of land in Milner, B.C and 20 acres of land in Pitt Meadows, B.C. In general the Company markets its products to established greenhouse growers, nurseries and retailers throughout North America. As the Company's business involves the cultivation and growing of plants, the business of the Company is subject to risks inherent in an agricultural business. To manage these risks, the Company grows its entire crop in climate-controlled greenhouses, and trained growing personnel continually monitor the growing conditions in the greenhouses.

The Products

Bevo Farms Ltd. propagates and provides new, vigorous, well rooted, healthy and pest free plants grown under stringent controlled conditions. The Company's main activity is the propagation of vegetable plants such as tomatoes, peppers, cucumbers, and other plants such as bedding plants, flowers and poinsettias. Bevo Farms Ltd. is a certified organic grower.

The Production Process

For the purposes of planning production, the Company selects its plant mix based on orders already received from customers. In a typical situation, the customer and the Company agree on the specific details of the propagation process of the plants to be sold, including the required age of the seedling, the desired plant variety, block space, plant spacing during the propagation stage, planting dates and delivery dates, amongst other details. Due to the nature of the product and the limited time between seeding and delivery, all details are confirmed in the sales agreement, and in a significant number of cases the Company requires a down payment.

Based on the required delivery date, the Company calculates seeding dates, germination percentages, transplant and spacing dates and schedules and arranges packing and shipping requirements.

Separate zones within the propagation greenhouse allows for different stages of propagation to be achieved simultaneously under stringent controlled conditions.

The process is relatively simple yet highly mechanized. The success of a crop depends largely on the attention to detail and care taken during the plant propagation process. Seeds may be provided by the individual growers according to species and genetic characteristics required by each grower. Propagation plants tend to be customer specific and individually identifiable. Utilizing various types of machinery at its facility, Bevo is able to control the combination of peat, sand, soil and fertilizers as these basic ingredients are manufactured into soil for each different plant. The selected seed is then automatically inserted into the mixture which is packaged in trays. These trays are moved into the greenhouse propagation area and placed under a daily monitoring and cultivation process that surveys temperature, moisture and fertilization requirements, amongst other things. These factors are monitored and adjusted through a computerized climate control system as scheduled. This controlled and accelerated growth process enables a healthy, disease free plant to be delivered that meets the customers' requirements.

The Company's operating results are seasonal, driven by the varying levels of activity in the growing cycles of the vegetable greenhouse crops, the bedding plant and flower seasons. Revenues and cash flows are affected by the seasonality of the seedling crop cycle, the timing of customer orders, the varying cycles of the greenhouse vegetable industry and the seasonality of the customer's planting season. The Company uses the completed contract method of accounting for recognizing revenue. This means that revenue from sales is not recognized until the date the delivery is actually made to the customer. As such, fluctuations in revenue between quarters may occur depending upon the planting schedules and delivery dates for the shipments to meet customer requirements.

Sales in the first quarter are typically lower than other quarters. This is due to the fact that the greenhouse vegetable industry is not replanting during this quarter, and bedding sales are not active during this time period. Typically the second quarter has stronger sales, as this is the season when greenhouse vegetable growers replant. This often extends into the third quarter. Sales in the fourth quarter are typically stronger than the other three quarters as the company has expanded its marketing of bedding plants.

There were no extraordinary items or discontinued operations requiring financial disclosure during the quarters under review.
